On November 7, 2015, Ma Ying-jeou and Xi Jinping met in Singapore. The meeting was duly recognized as being historic: it was the first time that the political leaders of China and Taiwan had ever met. It was also acknowledged as an event of global importance: the world has a shared interest in the maintenance of peace across the Taiwan Straits.

This event will convene a panel of experts to discuss the implications of the Xi-Ma meeting. What does the moment symbolize? What might it presage? And what does it mean in light of current political realities in China and Taiwan?
